ESTONIA 100

Film production in our 100-year-old brother country began already under tsar rule: the first Estonian filmmaker Johannes Pääsuke made both documentaries and fiction.

Upon gaining independence in 1918, fiction and documentaries were accompanied by experimental and animated films. The most important director of this era was Theodor Luts, who moved to Finland in the 1930s. During Soviet Estonia, the central government regulated film production and this was reflected in the films. The significance of animated films started to increase in the 1960s.

In the 1970s, the historical adventure

The Last Relic was released. More than half of the country's population saw the film and today it enjoys a special cult status.

When Estonia became independent for the second time in 1991, the film industry found itself in a momentary crisis and the emphasis was on coproduction with other countries. Later, fictional films and animations reclaimed their place.
